During the night after his first day Marcus woke up every half-hour or so. He could tell from the glowing hands on the dinosaur on the wall: 10.41, 11.19, 11.55, 12.35, 12.55... He couldn't believe he was going to have to go back there the next morning, and the morning after that, and the morning after, and ... well, then it would be the weekend, but more or less every morning for the rest of his life, just about.

All that night he thought like boomerangs fly: an idea would shoot way off into the distance, all the way to some place like Hollywood and, for a moment, when he had got as far away from reality as it was possible to go, he was reasonably happy; then it would begin the return journey, thump him on the head, and leave him in exactly the place he had started from. And all the time it got nearer and nearer to the morning.

He was quiet at breakfast. "You'll get used to it," his mum said as he was eating his cereal, probably because he was looking miserable. He just nodded and smiled at her; it was an OK thing to say. But this was only going to get worse. That first terrible, horrible, frightening day was going to be as good as it got.

Marcus knew he was funny, and he knew that part of the reason he was funny was because his mum was funny. If he wanted to do anything that any of the other kids spent their time doing, he had to argue with her for hours. He usually lost. She could explain why listening to Joni Mitchell and Bob Marley was much better for him than listening to Snoop Doggy Dogg. But if he tried to tell Lee Hartley – the biggest and loudest and nastiest of the kids he'd met yesterday – that he didn't approve of Snoop Doggy Dog because he had a bad attitude to women, Lee Hartley would thump him. It wasn't so bad in Cambridge, because there were loads of kids who weren't right for school, and loads of mums who had made them that way, but in London it was different. The kids were harder and meaner and less understanding, and it seemed to him that if his mum had made him move just because she had found a better job, then she should at least have the decency to stop all that let's-talk-about-this stuff.

It wasn't all his mum's fault. Sometimes he was weird just because of who he was, rather than what she did. Like the humming... He always had a tune in his head, but every now and again, when he was nervous, the tune just sort of slipped out. For some reason he couldn't spot the difference between inside and outside, because there didn't seem to be a difference. It was like when you went swimming in a heated pool on a warm day, and you could get out of the water without noticing that you were getting out, because the temperatures were the same. Anyway, a tune had slipped out yesterday during English, while the teacher was reading. If you wanted to make people laugh, he discovered, that was the best way to do it.
